

THE APPEAL.

Brighter Prospects.

From the M. O. Review, Oct. 26.]

Sojourner the people of New Orleans had so much trouble with their neighbors as at the present moment. The vigor of the epidemic has thinned the city for months in gloomy scenes of desolation and waste. The sun beams scintillate by day and die at night. It is overcast, and the air that rushes gently in the evening brings unnumbered frigidities upon its wings. A day or two ago the streets were with noisy echoes, and men began to walk with a heavy tread and brisk movement, and their faces bright. Now, however, they feel that they now look upon the retiring day. Danger has not passed, but the howl of dogs seems to have subsided.

The sun is down, the slow stamp of salutes passes through the streets, with specially given marks of respect to the dead, and the hurried steps of swelling thousands, mingled with the sounds of mournful dirges, mark the progress of the gloom of one of the most prosperous seasons.

Coincident with the well established principles of the new regime comes the general announcement of the sets of laws at all the stations that threaten the destruction of the great Southern business enterprise. The interests of New Orleans are in full bloom, and stand upon their ultimate success. It is virtually one of the great iron arches which stretches out to the horizon, and which will support the whole country for the whole world.
